

Bob Brown (1930-2007) was an inspiration to anyone who thought you had to have a biology degree to be a naturalist. He was a retired banker who pursued his life-long love of nature in his free time. Over the years, Bob walked, ran, and hiked virtually every square inch of Warner Parks, while also making his mark as a conservationist across the state.